

PS

3503

1735L3

BOOK WITH SINGING
AND OTHER POEMS

WITH ILLUSTRATIONS

Class _____

Book _____

Copyright N^o _____

COPYRIGHT DEPOSIT.

A LARK WENT SINGING
AND OTHER POEMS

A LARK WENT SINGING AND OTHER POEMS

BY (Thomson)
RUTH GUTHRIE HARDING Burton

WITH AN INTRODUCTION
BY RICHARD BURTON

EDMUND D. BROOKS MINNEAPOLIS
1916

PS 3503
U735L3

908

COPYRIGHT 1916 BY RUTH GUTHRIE HARDING

DEC 11 1916

16-24958

©CL A 453015

no. 1

For their courtesy in permitting me to reprint many of the poems in this book, I thank the editors of The Bellman, Lippincott's, Smart Set, The Poetry Journal, Poetry, A Magazine of Verse, The Caledonian, The Boston Transcript, The Saturday Evening Post, New Fiction, Neale's, and other magazines. I wish also to acknowledge here the many kindnesses of Mr. William Stanley Braithwaite.

1870

1871

1872

1873

1874

1875

1876

1877

1878

1879

1880

To Richard Burton

INTRODUCTION

THOSE who read American verse with an eye to quality, and recognize it in current writers, will not have been unmindful of the name of Ruth Guthrie Harding. A lyric now and then in the magazines, afterwards perhaps to be garnered in an anthology, will have arrested attention and imparted the pleasure that comes when the sense of poetry is quickened by a new claimant on the Muse.

Mrs. Harding's work is quite removed from the fashion of the hour: it utterly lacks strain and strut, it makes no bid for favor by the use of the grotesque, the super-subtle, the coarsely realistic or the stormily individualistic and protestant. It brings us back, contrarewise, in the simplest, most unobtrusive way, to that older yet ever-young appeal of Beauty which has a twin face, because it is both esthetic and spiritual. It is for this reason that the pieces printed in the following fascicle of poems, so slender in amount, so unassuming in tone, possess, it seems to me, the characteristics of genuine song: since they embody art, imagination, aspiration, and the gift of happy, singing words. Not afraid that the wings of flight shall be clipped by the restraint of law, such self-respecting work accepts the nobler traditions of the ars poetica, as if in consonance with Goethe's declaration that it is only within the strait confines of art that the artist finds his true freedom.

The gravamen of the charge that to do this means a slavish obedience of the past, and a consequent failure to represent the present, loses its weight in the answer that everything of value in art looks to the past. In art, a personal hallmark set upon a general human experience; voilà tout! The old becomes the new again; or better, there is neither new nor old, but only the true, the good and the beautiful.

What has been called "the lyric cry" is markedly present in this volume of verse. It is small wonder that Mr. O'Brien in The Boston Transcript should refer to the "lyric magic" of this versewoman; indeed, there is in her writing at times a stroke of tone color, a lilt, a cadence, a turn of phrase which, one hardly knows how, unite chemically in effects which startle with their felicity. The rhythmic sense is strong and of varied accomplishment; the range is remarkable in this respect. Mark the emotional sequences, the retardations and resolutions of "Threnody":

How still a grave can be,
Wrapt in the tender starlight, far from the moaning sea . . .

For never a road can take me beyond the wind and foam,
And never a road can reach him
who lies so far from home.

A wonderful gamut is run in such a lyric.

In what contrast is the vernal trochaic measure of "Returning":
There's a thrill of other spring-
times in the country soul of me!

And in an entirely different way, listen to the leap of the mingled anapests and dactyls of "Last Song of Apollo":

To me she is sunlight and shadow,
star-sweetness and rain.

"Grotesque" is another rich example of musical inventiveness; it is no excess of language so to call it.
And once again, what a feeling for marching time and the lure of jig beats through the superb little
"Call to a Scot!"

"Delhi" is yet another poem where the freedom of handling suggests mastery: that artistic irregularity of metre which is so superior to the customary jog trot of conventional verse. Such achievements, the gentle triumphs of poetic art which are likely to be noted by the few if at all, remind us that in all poetry that is truly such, movement must be the close-fitting garment of mood and meaning.

Nor can the emotional value of the work, with music as one of its by products, be overlooked by any poetry lover. Mrs. Harding's testament of song quivers with a feeling that gives it intensity and tonal texture. It has in it a kind of psychic tremble. But this is held in leash of art, restrained by taste; there is nothing in it of the unregulated sentiment which passes over into sentimentality; it recognizes instinctively that in reserve is a citadel of strength. There is a shy, Celtic wistfulness, an impulse of withdrawal in this expression of the deeper things; delicacy and indirection are like diaphanous veils that enhance the loveliness within.

Again and again in this fragrant little collection is sounded a lovely spiritual note; well illustrated in the several mother poems, with their uplifted adoration that is yet earth-warm and human:

We mothers with our stain of earth,
Marring the sanctity of birth.

How inevitably said that is and how it rings deep changes on the motif of motherhood, summing up in its simple way the whole mighty saga of woman! Nor is the throb in the message without mystic touches that suggest, to me for one, a fellowship with A. E., W. B. Yeats, and Housman of "Shropshire Lad" fame. It occurs in "To an Ambrotype," and is recurrent in "Etching after Daubigny," "The Wind on the Hilltop," "The Gypsy Stars are Camped," and "When I am Dead."

There is much profit in this, since it makes for atmosphere, evocation and overtones which do not so much define as suggest, hinting with half lights rather than stating facts at high noon. Such song is above all connotative. And it is this quality that gives a haunting potency to the love motives in the book; "Sanctuary," "In a forgotten Burying-ground," "Argenteuil," "Surrender," to mention but a few.

Yet this tendency in Mrs. Harding's utterance might lead to over-tension and vagueness; undoubtedly a danger in the feeling for and rendering of these exquisite, elusive states of the subjective mind. But this is avoided because of another trait: breadth, sweep and vigor are secured by the warm vibration of her interest in humanity; a flower of social sympathy which roots in the good, red soil of reality. This social note is present, although it is less insistently struck than with other of our younger singers; and seems for that very reason to escape the appearance of mannerism. One has only to read "At the Old Ladies' Home" and "Vignette" to see how true this is; and, in the homely folk vein "I See'd Ye Aince."

But what of the subject matter of such poetry, do you ask? What of its substance as well as its form and spirit? Surely, enough has been implied in enumerating the qualities it contains. In the light of them, the question of message is nugatory; where are charm, distinction, personality, it is sufficient; Beauty being its own best excuse. But if answer one must, let it be said that this verse is about the old, simple, dewy-fresh, eternal things; about love and loss, sorrow and truth, tender joy in the call and consolation of Nature, and faith in the divine that pulsates through the dust of day. In a sentence, it is about life and the ceasing from life, here and hereafter, with all its hope and heartbreak. Life is seized at the center, warmed by the emotions, made high with spiritual meanings, and then shaped for our pleasure because it comes to us by way of music and imagination.

To the present critic it would appear worth while to bring us poetry which does thus transmute the individual experience into the experience of all: since all partake of these elemental pains and privileges of living. And especially is this so now, when bards do not lack who can be relied upon to mouth and posture and find great joy in motives like the steam Calliope and the shambles on a hot day. The "one, clear call" of the song speech in the following pages is of another sort; a sort that is welcome at a time when vagaries are vainglorious and the honk of the automobile drowns out the still small voice that is even now flute-clear and flute-sweet, if we will but heed. Song of this other sort is modern because it is human, and the human knows no date; it savors of the old only because the old is human too; it is poetry of the future because it will be here in the final battle called Armegeddon and in the final peace which is Eden come again. Silly chatter about schools and forms and manners will make a little brief stir, a little din in our ears; but real Poetry will be ever about its business of stabbing us awake with Beauty and making the good, lovely. For of such is the very kingdom of song.

In this modest book, "A Lark Went Singing," there will be unfeigned delight for all who still desire Poetry, not for the exploitation of creed or mode or personality — but for its own sweet sake.

RICHARD BURTON

CONTENTS

INTRODUCTION	9
IN A FORGOTTEN BURYING-GROUND	23
THRENODY	24
A MECCA RUG	25
RETURNING	27
THE MADONNA OF THE CAR- PENTER-SHOP	29
TO AN AMBROTYPE	31
LAST SONG OF APOLLO	33
SONG FOR A STROLLER	35
GROTESQUE	37
SONG	39
FROM A CAR-WINDOW	40
THE CALL TO A SCOT	41
ETCHING AFTER DAUBIGNY	43
OF A YOUTH PASSING	45
DELHI	47

LULLABY	49
O CHRIST, WHO LAY IN MARY'S
ARMS	51
TO A CHILD	52
THE WIND ON THE HILL-TOP	54
FOR A 'CELLO MELODY	55
AT THE OLD LADIES' HOME	56
ARGENTUIL	60
A PERSIAN GRAVE	62
SALUTE	64
AT BENI-MORA	65
FOR THE FLY-LEAF OF A VOLUME
OF KEATS	66
FRAGMENT	67
SAVE IN HIS OWN COUNTRY	68
FIAT LUX	69
THE GYPSY STARS ARE CAMPED	71
SURRENDER	73
AFTERWARD	74
I SEE'D YE AINCE	75
I HEARD HER WHISPER	76
SANCTUARY	77
WHEN I AM DEAD	78

AGAIN IS IT APRIL	79
VIGNETTE	81
DAFFODILS	84
TRIOLET	85
A LARK WENT SINGING . .	86

IN A FORGOTTEN BURY- ING-GROUND

Eternal in the brooding of the old Norwegian spruces

I hear the wistful tenderness of loves They used to know,
And in the swelling wood-notes that the eager springtide looses Sobs again Their heart-break from the Springs of Long Ago:

And sometime, through the silence, with the April shadows lying

Aslant the solemn acre where I take my dreamless rest, Perhaps the stifled need of You my heart was ever crying Will find its way across the years — to stir a stranger's breast!

THRENODY

There's a grass-grown road from the valley—

A winding road and steep—

That leads to the quiet hill-top, where lies your love asleep. . .

While mine is lying, God knows where, a hundred fathoms deep.

I saw you kneel at a grave-side—

How still a grave can be,

Wrapt in the tender starlight, far
from the moaning sea!

But through all dreams and starlight, the breakers call to me.

Oh, steep is your way to Silence—

But steeper the ways I roam,

For never a road can take me beyond the wind and foam,

*And never a road can reach him
who lies so far from home.*

A MECCA RUG

Worn old carpet with colors rare,
Didst think it sacrilege
That late tonight in the shadows
there

One held me close and kissed my hair?

A breath that stirred in the languid air

Rose from thy faded edge.

A chant from the mosque by the inland sea

Was heavy in my ears:

There came some dusky memory. . .

When I was I in Araby,

Long, long ago I fashioned thee,

Scroll of a Thousand Years.

A temple-rug, with the niche for prayer

That my lord's dark knees oft pressed:

The shield, the comb, and the crescent there

Are symbols his tribe was wont to wear;

Mine the weaving?—Then mine the prayer . . .

May Allah guard his rest!

A chant from the mosque by the inland sea,

And the smart of forgotten tears.

Dost know what tonight's new love may be?

Perchance it will all be clear to me
When I shall be I in Araby

At the end of a thousand years!

RETURNING

Never sings a city-robin on the gray-stone window-ledges

But I dream the long, cool meadows where the yellow cowslips be;

To his call I guess an answer from the grass and tangled hedges—

There's a thrill of other spring-times in the country soul of me!

Never falls light rain above me but I hear its gentle patter

On a lonely roof at even, as I heard it years ago;

Through the music, warmth, and fragrance, past the sound of careless chatter,

Throbs the silence of far places where the pines and birches grow.

I shall see a few more spring-times, then shall heed no answer lilted

To that first full-throated robin, hear no rain above my head. . .
Give me, God, the meadow-blossoms when my formal wreaths have wilted —

Let me lie till Thine Own Springtime with the pines beside my bed!

"THE MADONNA OF THE CARPENTER-SHOP"

(Dagnan-Bouveret)

O Mary, in thy clear young eyes
What sorrow came at His first cry?

What hint of how He was to die Disturbed thee in the calm sunrise. . .

What shadow from the paling sky
Did fall across thy Paradise?

Dream'st thou the Garden, and the Tree?

Knew they were for the little child

Whose lips against thy warm breast smiled?

So sweet, that body close to thee,
By men's rough hands to be defiled;
So frail . . . yet waiting Calvary!

Ah, once I too lay spent and wan,
A tiny head against my heart,
And had my vision of the part
A child must play when years had gone —

And then I felt the quick tears start,
Remembering Jesus in the dawn.

O Mary, mother without guile,
We mothers with the stain of earth

Marring the sanctity of birth,
See heaven in thy baby's smile,
And, sinning, know the holy worth

Of what thou, sinless, dream'st that while.

TO AN AMBROTYPE

From out thy Silence, wilt thou hearken here
And let me feel thy touch upon my brow?
More than pale drifting dust art
 to me now, Woman I never knew, gone many a year. . .

And more than fleeting dream my face must be,
Where thou art lying in thy quiet bed;
Because I too would pillow his tired head—
I too have prayed . . . and would keep faith with thee.

Thou who didst make him, see, the light is dim Across the doubtful path we two have trod:

Yet would I trust thee, face to face with God,
To ask, "Without her, were it well with him?"

For, when at last I shall be comforted Within the Dark that long hath covered thee,
And God shall pass, thou wilt remember me
As one who loved thee well though thou wert dead.

LAST SONG OF APOLLO

Today I have fled from the Mountain;
and never again

As a god shall I roam by the fountain or sing in the glen.

The new gods be mute, if they heard me; nor glory nor fire

Hath leapt from my music and stirred me, so broken my lyre.

I cried to Latona who bore me—
she answered me not:

Diana hath perished before me,
and dark is the spot

Where silent the laurel-maid broodeth, forgiving but cold—

O Clytië, once so forsaken, . . . dost weep as of old?

Green Daphne I left in the meadow, unmoved of my pain.

To me she is sunlight and shadow,
star-sweetness and rain:

(But all through the years when I loved her, who never loved me,
Such, then, was the pain my forgetting had meted to thee?)
I could not remember thee only,
with her at my side—
Yet I might have pitied thee lonely, and made for thy pride Brief kindness, to spare thee thy sighing; or wreaths for thy brow. . .
O Clytië, Clytië, Clytië, where art thou now?

SONG FOR A STROLLER

Talents, you say, were lent for my using,

“Thrown to the four winds, lost in a day” —

A song on the highroad was more my choosing,

And smell o' the pine-woods along my way.

Friend I've none, nor sweetheart to love me,

Roof nor fireside, books nor kin —

Only the tall trees bending above
me. . .

A boy's clear dreams when the stars shine in!

Sun and rain in the silent places. . .

What for me where my talents lie?

Men might praise me, but in their faces

I read unrest as I wander by;

Women might smile — but ah, I've tasted

The rose-red dawn and the evening mist!

What care I for a full cup wasted,
What care I for those lips un-kissed?

Fame, good folk, had but proved a tasking,

Love is a blessing hard to keep —
A road to follow is all I'm asking,
And, at the last, a long, long sleep!

GROTESQUE

With the first light on the skyline came the rapping of the sickles
And the brown arms of the reapers bent to toil another morn; Close beside me in the glimmer, in the golden sweep and shimmer,

Knelt a reaper strange among us, crooning through the ragged corn:

“Born of sorrow,
Gone tomorrow —

Gone to lie in yonder valley where their fathers long have lain;
Men who know not ship nor sabre,
Each but drudges by his neighbor,
And the fields wherein they labor are a heritage of pain!”

Sleep was heavy on our eye-lids when a lone star followed sunset,
But we missed the pale young stranger, none knew whither he had gone—
Then, from where the dead are lying,
with the night-wind's tender sighing Rose and fell a last low cadence of the voice we heard at dawn:
"Weary reapers,
Early sleepers—Brief the glow that drifts across them from the waning August moon:
These that rest beyond its gleaming
Lie unvexed of drift or dreaming,
And the fields with harvest teeming have forgot them all too soon!"

SONG

FOR J. L. T.

O shadows past the candle-gleam,
so brief to pause in flight,
Are shadows that can come no more Still moving unseen on the door Of Yesternight?

O roses on the crumbling wall, so soon to droop and die,
Are any roses that are dead
Still fragrant where their petals bled
In Junes gone by?

O heart of mine, there is a face nor grief nor prayer can bring. . .
Think you in some far Shadow-land
One keeps my roses in his hand, Remembering?

FROM A CAR-WINDOW

Pines, and a blur of lithe young grasses;
Gold in a pool, from the western glow;
Spread of wings where the last thrush passes—
And thoughts of you as the sun dips low.

Quiet lane, and an irised meadow. . .

(How many summers have died since then?)

I wish you knew how the deepening shadow Lies on the blue and green again!

Dusk, and the curve of field and hollow

Etched in gray when a star appears:

Sunset, . . . twilight, . . . and dark to follow, . . .

And thoughts of you through a mist of tears.

THE CALL TO A SCOT

There came an ancient man and slow

Who piped his way along our street—

How could the neighbors' children know

That to her ears 'twas passing sweet?

With smiles they spoke the ragged kilt,

And jeered the pipes, in mirth-ful file;

But, strangely moved, she heard the lilt

That rallied Carrick and Argyle.

A stroller, playing in the street, Half-hearted, weary, out of place—

But his old measure stirred her feet,
My baby with the Gaelic face:

She squared her shoulders as she stood To watch the piper 'round the turn—Nor dreamed what beat within her blood Was Robert Bruce and Ban-nockburn!

ETCHING AFTER DAU- BIGNY

Hushed is the note of the night-bird's cry

On moorlands where lengthening shadows pass;

Cold is the reach of the dull gray sky

That borders the waste where the spent winds die

In fringes of rusty grass.

None but light fingers of ghosts have swept

The tangles apart for a vision of sea;

Even the echoes have long-while slept,

And only the lizard his watch has kept,

Aglint in a vine-hung tree.

Changeless that solitude: time and stress

Mark never the places by men
untrod:

Hidden the meanings of vast impress

Engraved on these pages of loneliness . . .

Dim lines from the Scroll of God.

OF A YOUTH PASSING

Out of half-remembering, the pagan gods designed him,
And meant to use a setting that they saved from Arcady;
But all the sunny dream-slopes, the fields and silver forests Are hidden from the visioning of mortals, all but me.

To mirror stars, they made his eyes like mystic pools at even,
But gave him not the poet's heart he had when time began;
They tuned his voice to reed-notes beloved of boyish shepherds, Yet waked in him no echoes of the melodies of Pan.

Sometimes, across the sunset-glow,
I see him turning homeward,
A dark and lonely figure in the sombre city street;

He does not guess a goat-skin should hang about his shoulder,

Nor miss those frisky little lambs that gamboled at his feet!

Out of half-remembering, the pagan gods designed him,

But lost some ancient loveliness and let the light grow dim—

And yet I catch that old mood, and grieving for his blindness,

I fare me back to Arcady, just because of him!

DELHI

*"Red are the lips of the courtesan
smiling,
Black is her heart as the tint of
her hair;
Faithful, beware...
Dawn puts an end to her hour of beguiling:
Haste ye to prayer!"*

Show me thy face, the bruised breast in these wrappings;
Now we are here on the darkening roof,
Of beauty give proof
To him who hath bought thee away from thy trappings
And set thee aloof.

Dost miss the gold bells from thine
ankles, O Dancer, Dost pine for the gayest bazaar in the Square?

Let down thy dark hair,
And see if the stars will not give me mine answer:
Child, art thou fair?

So spent . . . when the night hath had scarce its beginning?
What of thy pallor when morning shall break?
What odds does it make. . .
Many there are who have played for my winning
When love was the stake.

*"Red are the lips of the courtesan
smiling,
Black is her heart as the tint of
her hair;
Faithful, beware. . .
Dawn puts an end to her hour of
beguiling:
Haste ye to prayer!"*

LULLABY

J. G. H.

The mother-bird croons to her babies:

How safe is the nest in the tree!
It swings as she sings to the tender brown things
That nestle and crowd in the warmth of her wings . . .
(So nestle, my darling, to me.)

The mother-bird fears for her babies:

Their weeks in the tree-top are few.
What way can she say that she wants them to stay,
How keep them from falling or flying away?
(O, darling . . . I'm fearing for you.)

The mother-bird grieves for her babies:

So empty and still is the nest!
I see in the tree what my own nest will be

When you have grown strong and have no need of me . . .

(But hush you, my darling, and rest.)

O CHRIST, WHO LAY IN MARY'S ARMS

O Christ, Who lay in Mary's arms, Whose face against her face was pressed,
My arms have burden light for Thee,
Would lay it on Thy pitying breast.

Look, Thou: these little quiet hands,
These baby-eyes that could not see;
Wilt warm his heart against Thy heart,
And hold his frailty close to Thee?

Wilt kiss the lips that could not know
His mother's lips that breathe this prayer?—

O take this lost lamb to Thy fold,
And give it, Christ, a shepherd's care!

TO A CHILD

A dream is just a little boat whose sails are made of sleep;
Oh, safely may yours ever float upon the starry deep,
And (though it drift far out to sea)
Come home to me!

A dream is just a butterfly above a poppy-ring;
Oh, may yours never flutter by
with bruises on its wing,
But rest upon some slender stalk Near where I walk!

A dream is just a climbing rose against a sanded wall;
Oh, may yours glad the garden-close before its petals fall,
And, to my lips on your pink cheek,
Its sweetness speak! . . .

* * *

My boat it sailed and lost its way,
with none to see it pass;
My rose was faded in a day and scattered on the grass . . .
One winged thing glints the twilight-blue:
My hope for You!

THE WIND ON THE HILL- TOP

The wind on the hill-top bruiseeth
and bendeth the young trees
over;

The old trees stand.

So Love kisseth thee on the mouth,
O Maiden, and layeth his hand
But light on my year-limned brow, and must powerless pass me by.

The wind on the hill-top bruiseeth
and bendeth the young trees
over—

Yet the trees strong-standing are they that quiver and sigh!

FOR A 'CELLO MELODY

Life's a road that has no turning:
Ah, how steep!

By the wayside Love's an altar:
Pray—and weep. . .

(But the dust from incense-burning, none shall keep.)

God, your weariness discerning,
Broken hope and silent yearning,
Gives as treasure of your earning,
Sleep:

Gives as measure of your earning, only Sleep.

AT THE OLD LADIES' HOME

There in a row of chairs upon the porch
I saw them, women alien from the world,
Set in a niche to watch the world go by:
A few, born saints . . . but some had outworn sin;
Sisters at last, from having done with life.
Here Joan of Arc, grown past her soldier-dream,
And Mariamne, spared her Herod's wrath,
Forgetting Herod, gossiped for an hour;
While calm Francesca, once knowing Paolo's love,
Sat knitting peaceful in the noonday sun,

And Nicolette, with Aucassin long gone,
Made painful writing with a wrinkled hand.

“Ah, let me die,” I prayed, “before the glow
Shall leave my body, and before my tears
Shall buy me patience; take me while I feel
The lure-of-things that blesses with its hurt—
Dear God, give me not age!” (For I would keep You in my heart of hearts . . . for whose sad eyes
These lines are set, O Dearest . . . to the last.)

Just then, among the many faces
there,
I glimpsed a face most delicate and pale
And very lovely with that wistful-ness
In which the shadows of long sorrow lie;

Meeting my look, she smiled, and,
 with that smile,
Somehow the lilacs by the iron fence,
The plumed grass brushing low across the path,
Brought back to me an afternoon in May
And a sweet garden where I sometimes played
When I fared forth in gingham pinafore:
I saw Another (dead so many years,
Her name I could not in that hour recall) :
Old she had been as ashes in a jar
She kept upon a high, old-fashioned chest
In an old-fashioned room in her still house . . .
Now I remembered with what passionate warmth
A cheek had once been pressed against my cheek,
What frail and trembling arms had lifted me

To touch that silvery dust within the jar.

Perhaps it is God's will I shall grow old

And none may read beneath my quietness . . .

Gardens in May, or any memory
Of you! And yet for very shame tonight

I change my prayer, and ask for strength to live.

ARGENTEUIL

Heloise speaks:

I saw a vestal sunset—'twas the hour

That marked my travail there in Brittany:

So calm, so holy, like a sign from God

That all my stain was washed away;
and I

With this full woman's-heart within my breast

Was comforted as is a little child, Smiled at . . . forgiven its brief trespasses.

Then died that splendor . . . cold
the sky, and far:

Wrapt in the world's long shadow, the pure glow

Faded before mine eyes.

O Abelard,

So fades Repentance, wrapt in Memory!

This time is God's, this place, all else is thine . . .

Thine, for no prayer can shut these eyes to truth,

No penance blot out sin like mine with thee.

Here in these vigils on my tortured knees,

I cry, "Make clean . . . give me again a sign" . . .

Yet—for my praying lips I crave thy kiss,

The thrill of thee for mine uplift-ed arms.

A PERSIAN GRAVE

At Naishapur in Khorassan
The drifting rose-leaves lightly fall
Across the gray old garden-wall
That marks the spot where you began

To speculate, quite unafraid —
Those Persian roses, how they fade!

You laughed — 'twas where today
you lie:

Ah, there was One who laughed beside,

And brought to you the world-old lure,

The while the roses bloomed and died

Where now the roses bloom and die
At Naishapur.

At Naishapur in Khorassan
The glow of life is in the vine:

Plenty there are to sing of wine;
Poets to ponder o'er the Plan,
And hearts to feel the ancient fire...
Though none has found that 'Heart's-Desire.'

You sang—'twas where today you sleep—
Where sleeps that One whose soul you thrilled?
Say, friend, does Time make dreaming sure?
As over your grave the cup is filled,
Do roses and wine old sweetness keep
At Naishapur?

SALUTE!

(Paul Verlaine to Aubrey Beardsley)

Walking alone upon the edge of Sleep,
I found the path a puzzling one and steep:
Now thou art come—O Brother, lift thine eyes
And say what seems it . . . hell or paradise?
(Which hath a blood-red twilight and a black moonrise?)

AT BENI-MORA

And once, dear heart, I prayed to miss the lot
That comes of loving and of lover's loss;
Yea, helpless, begged of Life to stretch me not Upon the cross.
It is Life's will that sacrifice be mine;
And, scourged, I wear the thorns.
Write thou the sign.

FOR THE FLY-LEAF OF A VOLUME OF KEATS

“The day is gone, and all its sweets
are gone” —

The long night stilled the hunger on thy lips.

Too late was Fame, with healing finger-tips

To smooth thy brow; but in another dawn

She found thee, dear, who lay so spent and wan:

Knelt there and kissed thee, dropping penitent tears,

And breathed her vow to love thee through the years.

“The day is gone, and all its sweets
are gone” —

Ah, couldst thou know the darkness was withdrawn!

FRAGMENT

If Passion's fitful days were sweet to you,

I pray you keep their sweetness
in your heart,

And dream awhile of joys when life was new . . .

Forgetting me, who played the later part.

(I sometimes think God might have come my way,

Had there been aught in you to bid Him stay.)

SAVE IN HIS OWN COUNTRY

They spoke of "Failure," when the bravest of their kind First shook the country dust from his young feet—
And then of "Failure," when in years his path did wind Back to their paths; nor knew that Fame could find
 Its old ways sweet!

FIAT LUX

It seemed to us that o'er mute, unseen strings
He drew his fingers, worn and coarse with toil;
That he who knew Life's meagreness and soil
In his last hour transcended common things.
Sometimes, they say, the dying impulse brings
That harper's-motion to rude finger-tips,
Lays a warm smile across the coldest lips,
Frees from the voiceless clay a soul that sings.

'Twas so with him. We knew the labored speech,
The heavy step, the sordid, care-filled days;

Love, music, laughter, deemed beyond his reach,
Nor guessed the hurt beneath his uncouth ways . . .
Till at the last Death changed the sullen guise, Gave him a harper's touch . . . a poet's eyes.

THE GYPSY STARS ARE CAMPED

The gypsy stars are camped around the moon —

That nomads'-fire along the road of Night —

And resting there before they take their flight,

What lullabies the older stars must croon:

Songs of the byways where with silent shoon

Age-long they wander; where at early light

Their caravan slips quietly from sight . . .

And hides its trail across the sky at noon.

That secret trail! To think where it began

Or how it ends? . . . when myriad moon-fires glow

In camps at even where God's highroads be?
When tribes of stars, unguessed,
undreamed by man,
Too far for these the earth-seen stars to go,
Find trail on trail . . . to deeper mystery?

SURRENDER

Young and trusting, blithe and fair,
I was the maid he took to wife . . .
But bruises on my heart I wear,
Who wedded Life.

So reach thy lover's-arms to me—
Burn thou my lips with eager breath:

Once will I share thine ecstasy
With thee, O Death!

AFTERWARD

I did not know how short your day would be!

I had you safe. My words could wait awhile.

And yet . . . your eyes begged tenderness of me

Behind their smile.

And now for you, so dark, so long,
is night.

I speak, but on my knees, unheard, alone—

What words were these to make a short day bright . . .

If I had known!

I SEE'D YE AINCE

I see'd ye aince on maurket-day:
Sae bonnie was your smile,
I gaed (tae pass ye on the brae)
Oot o' ma road a mile.

Your een was een that wadna see,
But, man, ye steppit braw,
An' O, ye was the lad for me . . .
Wha cam an' gaed awa'.

Ah, dearie, sic a load is love!
Wi' me ye had nae pairt;
But ither maurket-days juist prove
The breakin' o' ma hairt.

Your een was een that wadna see,
But licht tae mine they lent . . .
An' O, ye was the lad for me,
If ye had only kent!

“I HEARD HER WHISPER”

I heard her whisper soft my name,
a dream or two ago:
She strayed adown Sleep's quiet path,
And oh, the lure her nearness hath . . .

Do I not know?

I felt her kiss, light on my brow; I woke and she was gone—
Dear God, to know which pitying star Points where the mist-hung meadows are
That lie beyond the dawn!

SANCTUARY

If I could come to you one holy hour
And lay this weary head upon your breast,
Or wear unseen against my heart a flower
That your warm fingers had but lately pressed,
God knows . . . to me might come a dreamed-of rest:
As, at the close, one lies amid the bloom,
So my scarred soul, in last white garments dressed, Beneath pale tapers lighting all the gloom
Might lie in quiet in a hallowed Inner Room.

WHEN I AM DEAD

When I am dead, how will you watch

Alone the sunset-light,
Or heed the shining galleons' drift
Across the path of night?

What ships that brought our cargoes in

Must pass the harbor by,
Toward me what stars be outward bound

Down sea-lanes of the sky?

When I am dead, how will you meet

The gladness of a dawn Come back to you from out the dark

Where love and I are gone?

AGAIN IS IT APRIL

Buds on the willow and sap in the
alder,
And hearts to their tryst at the close of the day:
'Twas long-ago April when love
and I called Her, Kissed in the shadows — and
went on our way.

Kissed in the shadows! . . . the thought of it follows
The track of the years, and it lightens their load:
Sweet as the breath of those fern-spicy hollows,
Youth and maid meeting at bend
of the road.

Again is it April, though April be over;
O, where do the ghosts of the dead Aprils go?

In spring-time the years find me always a lover—
(And where She is waiting, anemones blow.)

Buds on the willow and sap in the
alder,
And hearts to their tryst at the close of the day:
'Twas long-ago April when love
and I called Her,
Kissed in the shadows— and
went on our way.

VIGNETTE

(E. L.)

The old, old man from the Rescue Mission, come to sell me three bags of wood,

Leaned his arms on the wide stone railing: "I'd like to rest, if you'd say I could."

His dirty hands were long and slender; the bridge of his nose was fine and high;

His shaky voice held a rare, strange echo out of life that had passed him by.

"Take a chair in the sun," I answered — and saw the bruise above one eye.

He asked for the piece of the morning paper that lay, all wrinkled, beneath my feet;

He took from his pocket some ten-cent glasses (tied with a string that was far from neat!)

The smell of whiskey was faint, but certain. I looked again at that regal head,
And thought of the men of gentle breeding, the women who made him, long-time dead: “God knows the story that lies behind him, the grave that waits him,” my pity said.
I stood in silence; we spoke no further till ribald urchins called out in glee,
“Look-a the Wood-man, the crazy Wood-man!” . . . He flushed and turned his face to me: “Boys will be boys . . . perhaps these mothers would feel like mine, who rebuked me when I mocked the tune of a strolling fiddler . . . I think I was not much over ten,
But I remembered, through much forgetting, and never could give such hurt again. . .”

The old, old man from the Rescue Mission, come to sell me three bags of wood, Shuffled away in the pavement-shadows. The wares I purchased were none too good — But his dirty hands were long and slender; the bridge of his nose was fine and high;
His shaky voice held a rare, strange echo out of a life that had passed him by. . .
(But what can you do when they smell of whiskey, and have a bruise above one eye?)

DAFFODILS

There flames the first gay daffodil
Where winter-long the snows have
lain:

Who buried Love, all spent and still?

There flames the first gay daffodil.
Go, Love's alive on yonder hill,
And yours for asking, joy and pain.
There flames the first gay daffodil
Where winter-long the snows have lain!

TRIOLET

Deep in the heart of me,
Nothing but You!
See through the art of me —
Deep in the heart of me,
Find the best part of me,
Changeless and true.
Deep in the heart of me,
Nothing but You!

A LARK WENT SINGING

A lark went singing in the morning glow —
And I remembered that you could not know;
And that the songs my heart had made for you Must sing themselves to silence in the blue.

But in the sunset-hush there came again
A clear, brave note . . . and Something whispered then:
“He hears no answer, but the weary lark Still sings, and lifts the song to meet the dark.”

THE TORCH PRESS
CEDAR RAPIDS
IOWA

Deacidified using the Bookkeeper process
Neutralizing Agent: Magnesium Oxide Treatment Date: . . .

JAN 1999
BOOKKEEPER PRESERVATION TECHNOLOGIES, L.P.
111 Thomson Park Drive
Cranberry Township, PA 16066
(724) 779-2111

LIBRARY OF CONGRESS

0 005 828 212 1

